It is not generally known, however, that the first shot from the American side at Lexington was fired by Oliver Brown, a native of Lexington, who also killed the first British soldier. Brown became an officer in the Revolutionary army, led the party that pulled down and melted up the leaden equestrian statue of George III., and so furnished the Continental army with bullets. He subsequently settled in Wellsburg, Brooke county, Va., where, as General Oliver Brown, he was known for many years as a leading citizen.

In the Lexington attack seven Americans were killed and nine wounded. In the attack of the citizens of Baltimore on the Sixth Massachusetts regiment, according to Pollard, "two of the soldiers were shot, several of the citizens were killed, and more than twenty were variously wounded." A northern historian (Headley) says that the Massachusetts regiment "had two killed and eight wounded. Seven of the rioters were killed and several Another (Abbott) says the The citizen who it is believed shot Ladd became a very gallant soldier in the Confederate States army, and was killed at Gettysburg. The fact is thus established that the first shedding of blood and the first loss of life in the Contederate war occurred at Baltimore April 19, 1861.

General Skobeleff came in last night, atended by a few Cossacks, having left the main part of his command six or seven miles behind. It was the first time I had met this celebrated man, and the impression he left is that he is one of the most genial as well as the most skilful generals of the Russian Dispatch for the month of August occurs army. His bravery will in time become legendary. He always wears his white uniform when he goes into the fight, and rides Weekly Times, stating that Baily Brown, of white steeds, of which he has already had the Harrison Guards, who was killed in four shot under him during the present West Virginia May 22, 1861, was the first campaign. During the reconneissance which he made within the last few days in the vicinity of Lovtcha he had two horses whom men will follow whether he leads to victory or to death.
